Expanding an Idea Through Critical Reflection:

Noticing and interpreting what children do and why they do it probes the connection between thinking and questioning and shows or makes visible the way children are making meaning of their learning or of their interaction with the world. As one interprets and critically reflects on a moment/observation, intriguing question and insight can be gained without requiring absolute certainty about the situation.

Reflective Questions for the Pathway: Inter-Relationships of Humans and Natural Environments

How can I encourage children to recognize that humans and the natural world are connected and mutually dependent on one another?

In what ways can I acknowledge children's small moments with ants, birds, or worms as meaningful relationships?

What practices do I cultivate that enrich and deepen children's relationship with place, land, and the creatures and forms within it?

What stories do children have of land, place, and the creatures and forms within it?

What opportunities do children have to care for their environments (e.g., cleaning, fixing, gardening, helping others)?

(British Columbia Early Learning Framework, p. 90)

Where early care and learning programs and schools are situated within or near Indigenous communities, educators can contribute to the social well-being and cultural vitality of the community by exploring ways of honouring and learning from community Elders.

Pathway: Indigenous Voices and Perspectives

- How might I bring ideas and concepts I have learned through Indigenous partners and resources into my program?
- How might my biases and perceptions impact my work?
- How can I ensure that I have high expectations for Indigenous children while accommodating, recognizing, and celebrating differences?
- How might I begin conversations with colleagues, families, and children about Canada's history of colonialism?
- How might I respectfully ask Elders for guidance on cultural protocols, and then share them with staff, parents, and children?
- What can I do to ensure that the diversity of Indigenous cultures are recognized and reflected in my program?
